This list covers the period from Augustus' reorganisation until the defeat of Albinus by Septimius Severus. This is the period of the rectangular semi-cylindrical shield and lorica segmentata popularly thought of as legionary equipment, though these were not used throughout and not universally. Auxiliary units were now uniformly equipped and drilled. The option to class the C-in-C's bodyguard as Ax (S) represents a provincial governor's lanciarii. A few alae of contarii/catafractarii were formed by Trajan and Hadrian. These did not have horse armour, but were armed with the long contus. Most equites carried shields and shorter spears and javelins. Equites of mixed cohortes were identically equipped, but not expected to be as efficient. They were usually combined into ala-sized units in battle. Dromedarii were first raised by Trajan and both used as independent units for border patrols and as camel detachments for mixed cohortes. Claudius used elephants and camels in the invasion of Britain in 43 AD, represented here by a single element including both but counting as elephants. Although its cavalry is quite good, the strength of this army lies in its legionaries, with one proviso. The legionaries can be swept away by warbands, and it is best to engage these first with a front line of auxilia, as was normal Roman practice. Equites alares and cohortales can always dismount as Ax (S). Bd (I) cannot provide rear support for Bd (O). Troops marked [V] can only be used by Vitellius, those marked [O] by Otho, those marked [C] by Petillius Cerialis.
